The main driver is company earnings. Companies slashed costs in response to the recession, and these savings have helped them recover. As a result, earnings growth has recently shot up. In the second quarter, the S&P 500 are forecast at $119.35 per share this year, up 15 percent from what they earned in 2009.

Hiring is picking up and costs are down, and that is good news. There are more jobs, and the unemployment rate is down. Although some of the jobs are part-time, that is much better than nothing.

Bull markets end not with a bang but a whimper. Usually it is a slow, painful process, as June, few expect a rapid sell-off. The main driver is company earnings. Companies slashed costs in response to the recession, and these savings have helped them recover. As a result, earnings growth has recently shot up. In the second quarter, the S&P 500 are forecast at $119.35 per share this year, up 15 percent from what they earned in 2009.

Hiring is picking up and costs are down, and that is good news. There are more jobs, and the unemployment rate is down. Although some of the jobs are part-time, that is much better than nothing.

Bull markets end not with a bang but a whimper. Usually it is a slow, painful process, as June, few expect a rapid sell-off. The main driver is company earnings. Companies slashed costs in response to the recession, and these savings have helped them recover. As a result, earnings growth has recently shot up. In the second quarter, the S&P 500 are forecast at $119.35 per share this year, up 15 percent from what they earned in 2009.

Hiring is picking up and costs are down, and that is good news. There are more jobs, and the unemployment rate is down. Although some of the jobs are part-time, that is much better than nothing.

Bull markets end not with a bang but a whimper. Usually it is a slow, painful process, as June, few expect a rapid sell-off. The main driver is company earnings. Companies slashed costs in response to the recession, and these savings have helped them recover. As a result, earnings growth has recently shot up. In the second quarter, the S&P 500 are forecast at $119.35 per share this year, up 15 percent from what they earned in 2009.

Hiring is picking up and costs are down, and that is good news. There are more jobs, and the unemployment rate is down. Although some of the jobs are part-time, that is much better than nothing.

Bull markets end not with a bang but a whimper. Usually it is a slow, painful process, as June, few expect a rapid sell-off. The main driver is company earnings. Companies slashed costs in response to the recession, and these savings have helped them recover. As a result, earnings growth has recently shot up. In the second quarter, the S&P 500 are forecast at $119.35 per share this year, up 15 percent from what they earned in 2009.

Hiring is picking up and costs are down, and that is good news. There are more jobs, and the unemployment rate is down. Although some of the jobs are part-time, that is much better than nothing.

Bull markets end not with a bang but a whimper. Usually it is a slow, painful process, as June, few expect a rapid sell-off. The main driver is company earnings. Companies slashed costs in response to the recession, and these savings have helped them recover. As a result, earnings growth has recently shot up. In the second quarter, the S&P 500 are forecast at $119.35 per share this year, up 15 percent from what they earned in 2009.

Hiring is picking up and costs are down, and that is good news. There are more jobs, and the unemployment rate is down. Although some of the jobs are part-time, that is much better than nothing.

Bull markets end not with a bang but a whimper. Usually it is a slow, painful process, as June, few expect a rapid sell-off. The main driver is company earnings. Companies slashed costs in response to the recession, and these savings have helped them recover. As a result, earnings growth has recently shot up. In the second quarter, the S&P 500 are forecast at $119.35 per share this year, up 15 percent from what they earned in 2009.

Hiring is picking up and costs are down, and that is good news. There are more jobs, and the unemployment rate is down. Although some of the jobs are part-time, that is much better than nothing.

Bull markets end not with a bang but a whimper. Usually it is a slow, painful process, as June, few expect a rapid sell-off. The main driver is company earnings. Companies slashed costs in response to the recession, and these savings have helped them recover. As a result, earnings growth has recently shot up. In the second quarter, the S&P 500 are forecast at $119.35 per share this year, up 15 percent from what they earned in 2009.

Hiring is picking up and costs are down, and that is good news. There are more jobs, and the unemployment rate is down. Although some of the jobs are part-time, that is much better than nothing.