Course description and objectives:

To the degree that you read a text analytically, to the degree that your terminology claims to encompass it, claims to know the text better than it knows itself, to that degree you give up the possibility of being read by it. A book can have inspirational value only if it is allowed to recontextualize much of what you had known.
Richard Rorty, “The Necessity of Inspired Reading”

This course is a graduate seminar (from the Latin seminarium, a “breeding ground or plant nursery”). That’s exactly what I hope for, and intend, to gather as a breeding ground and nursery in which the seeds of the book are nurtured and brought forth in the soil and light and watering of our work.

As set forth in my announcement of the course, we will work collaboratively:

1. with the chapters in the Allegories text;
2. with some additional Allegories chapters not included (for various reasons) in the final text; and most gratefully
3. with allegorical and metaphorical and mythopoetic touchstones of yours, brought forth as similar surfaces for learning.
Our meetings will be organized, as would a breeding ground, around the Allegories as seeding. As in the appended schedule, in our gatherings we will address the Allegories sequentially, with collaborative consideration of each of their window, landscape, and especially questioning components. Each of us is expected to have read the assigned chapter for that gathering and to consider it deeply. We will be able to dwell deeply in the material and more importantly allow it to come to life in our teaching, psychotherapy, and supervision work.

I also have in mind a structure for facilitating your bringing of your gifts, as designated docents. A docent is an informed guide, one who has done additional work to accompany and tend a journey. In this role I would like each of you to:

- review the table of contents and the chapter abstracts;
- identify two chapters of personal and professional interest;
- indicate those designations on a shared spreadsheet;
- prepare for proctoring and facilitating our gathering around those chapters through:
  - preparing a two-page “guide” in which you
    - summarize what is interesting or provocative to you about the reading
    - suggest some specific landscape territories
    - point toward several specific “questions for the traveler” or generate some of your own
  - e-mail this guide to all class members no later than 24 hours before our gathering
  - lead us in our shared consideration of the chapter (as would a docent) from an informed perspective

Course Requirements:

1. Attendance

Each of us will be expected to attend all class meetings. No explanation for absence is necessary; rather, you are encouraged to take responsibility for compensating for any necessary absence (e.g., through asking another student to record the meeting for your later listening enjoyment).

2. Readings

Do all the reading. Graduate study is not a spectator sport, and you cannot do justice to the material, to our process, and ultimately to yourself without thorough preparation.

   a. Keep notes. Underline or highlight passages that seem especially interesting or unusually unclear for later discussion. Your notes will be very helpful as you prepare for and contribute to course discussion.
   b. Ask yourself questions. I’ve framed windows and sketched landscapes and suggested questions, but you will want to have some of your own. Find something to be curious about in each reading.
   c. Look for bridges and linkages. This is my book, my voice, but it both speaks and echoes. Chase down some of the theoretical structures or ideas I reference. Try to interrogate and question and contextualize my necessary brief treatment.
Evaluation:

The emphasis throughout will be on learning as an end in itself, and especially in a class like this we would not want to ignore or minimize the effect of evaluation on collaboration. As a necessary concession to the system, grades will be assigned collaboratively as follows:

A  -- Exceptionally good completion of all course requirements

B  -- Satisfactory completion of all course requirements

C – Less than satisfactory or partial completion of course requirements
